Socialization of Education about Early Marriage in Rural Communities

Sarkar Malla
1Bangladesh Open University

Abstract. The socialization of education concerning early marriage in rural areas is the subject of this report. In many rural areas, girls are still getting married off at young ages, which has devastating effects on their futures as learners and on their health and safety. Community workshops, peer education programs, parental education, and media campaigns are all included in the report as viable socializing activities to encourage girls to continue their education and postpone marriage. Effective tactics, such as incorporating local leaders, partnering with schools and health centers, employing culturally relevant materials, monitoring and evaluation, are needed to put these efforts into action. To guarantee the success of these endeavors, however, it will be necessary to overcome obstacles including community opposition, scarce resources, and language and cultural divides. In order to enhance results for girls, families, and communities, the report emphasizes the necessity of a long-term commitment to supporting girls’ education and delaying marriage.

Keywords: Socialization, Education, Early Marriage, Rural Communities

Received: October 20, 2022 Received in Revised: November 5, 2022 Accepted: December 20, 2022

INTRODUCTION

Marriage at a young age is common in many rural areas of the world, as reported by Bhattarai et al. (2022a). Millions of girls, especially in low-income nations, are still badly impacted by early marriage each year, despite efforts to limit its occurrence. When females are married at a young age, they often have to give up their education and their chances of succeeding in life (Bhattarai et al., 2022b). Additionally, girls who are married at a young age are more likely to have preterm births and other health problems. Therefore, effective strategies to reduce the prevalence of early marriage and boost girls’ access to quality education and healthcare are required in rural areas (Deane, 2021).

Socializing education on the risks of early marriage is one viable strategy, say Ninsiima et al. (2018). The term "socialization" is used to describe how a society's culture and norms are passed down from one generation to the next. As stated by Tremblay et al. (2015), the prevalence of early marriage can be lowered by the dissemination of information about the negative effects of this practice. This research discusses the importance of early marriage education in rural areas and offers suggestions for how to implement this strategy.

The goal of this report is to provide light on successful methods of disseminating early marriage education in rural areas. This paper intends to socialize education about early marriage by doing a literature analysis and original research to determine the most significant difficulties associated with early marriage in rural communities, examining prior efforts to address the issue, and proposing actions that could be undertaken to do so. This research aims to provide a meaningful contribution to the current literature on child marriage by offering concrete advice to politicians, educators, and practitioners who are fighting to improve the lives of girls in rural areas through issues like education and health.

Community-based initiatives to combat the prevalence of child marriage in rural areas

Chatkaewnapanon & Lee (2022) state that... Community workshops can be held to inform people about the harms of child marriage and the benefits of educating and empowering young women. Workshops like these can be led by professionals or community members with first-hand knowledge of the topic at hand (Chatkaewnapanon & Lee, 2022). Group talks, role-playing games, and presentations by women whose lives have been changed by education are all viable options (Koff et al., 2020).

Girls who have already completed their education can mentor and advise younger girls in peer education programs about the value of postponing marriage and continuing their education. Group discussions, mentoring, and skill-building workshops are just some of the activities that can be a part of these programs, which can be held anywhere from a classroom to a community center.

Education for Parents: Parents can be educated on the importance of their daughters' education and the drawbacks of getting them married too young. Trained educators can either host workshops for the community or make house calls. Parents might be encouraged to take an active role in their daughters’ educational and marital planning.

The media can be used to spread information about the harms of child marriage and the benefits of educating and empowering young women. Billboards, billboard displays, television, radio, and social media can all play a role in these efforts. A focus on girls’ education and empowerment can counter cultural beliefs that favor marriage at a young age.

Girls can be empowered to delay marriage and continue their education through the establishment of initiatives that take place within the classroom. Life skills training, mentoring, and extracurricular activities are just some of the things that can be a part of these programs. The provision of necessities like sanitary pads and school materials can also be used to keep girls in school.

Working Together with Municipal Officials: Promoting girls’ education and empowerment while also challenging cultural norms and attitudes that favor early marriage requires establishing partnerships with local leaders like community elders, religious leaders, and traditional authorities. The goal of these partnerships is to keep females in school and postpone their marriage.

Educating rural populations about the dangers of early marriage can be accomplished using any one of these measures. The community’s needs and circumstances should guide the selection of activities. Collaboration between community people, educators, legislators, and local leaders is essential for the successful implementation of these initiatives.

Figure 1 Activities to socialize education about early marriage in rural communities

Implementation strategies
Puffer (2018) claims that Leaders at the community level, such as elders, religious and traditional leaders, can be crucial in encouraging girls to stay in school and delaying marriage. Involving the community in the planning and execution of socialization activities can go a long way toward earning their trust and support. They can assist change minds about girls’ education and empowerment by shedding light on local customs and traditions.

Integration of Health and Education: Important settings for enacting socialization activities include educational institutions and medical facilities. School-based initiatives can be made available to girls and can be implemented in schools. Postponing marriage is possible with the help of health centers’ resources on reproductive health and family planning. Working in tandem with these organizations can make socialization initiatives more long-lasting and productive.

Culturally relevant and effective socialization exercises can be enhanced by making use of culturally suitable materials. Posters, pamphlets, and videos should all be created in local languages and adapted to fit local cultural norms. To ensure that they are culturally appropriate and effective, community members should be involved in their creation.

Educators and facilitators on the ground need to be given the tools they need to carry out socialization programs successfully. The capacity of local educators and facilitators to deliver socializing activities can be strengthened through training. They need to learn about issues related to gender, how to communicate well, and how to rally the community.

The success of socialization activities can be judged and improvement points pinpointed through careful monitoring and evaluation. To make sure that socialization activities are carried out as intended and to evaluate their effect on girls’ education and postponing marriage, continuous monitoring and evaluation should be carried out. Monitoring and evaluation should include community members to make sure programs are meeting their needs.

Long-Term Sustainability: Planning for sustainability is essential to ensuring that socializing activities have a lasting impact. Sustainable socialization activities are those that are planned and implemented with the goal of continuing their work after the project’s completion. To do so, it may be necessary to strengthen local institutions and form alliances with government and non-governmental organizations (Berkes, 2017).

Collaboration between community members, teachers, legislators, and local leaders is essential for successful implementation of these measures. Community needs and circumstances should inform strategy selection.
Potential challenges and ways to address them

The findings of Frumence et al. Community members' traditional ideas and attitudes concerning early marriage provide a significant barrier to the successful implementation of socialization programs. To combat this, trust and support-building initiatives should be developed alongside local leaders and community people. Education and awareness about the risks of child marriage and the upsides of continuing a girl's education are equally crucial.

Shortage of Materials: Financial and material constraints can make it difficult to carry out socialization initiatives. To combat this, it's possible to form alliances with regional and global groups, tap into government funding, and ask for in-kind contributions (Horan, 2019). To make the most of limited resources, it is essential to set priorities for projects in light of community needs and circumstances.

Baldacchino (2015) claims that The effectiveness of socialization activities may be diminished due to a lack of access to educational and medical resources. To combat this, institutions of higher learning and healthcare providers should work together to expand patients' access to a full range of medical care options, including those related to sexual and reproductive health. It could also involve lobbying government officials and community members for more funding for health and education.

Communication and comprehension in group activities might be hampered by a lack of a common language or an unfamiliar culture. This issue can be fixed by using local translators and interpreters and using content that is tailored to the target culture. Educators and facilitators in the area may need to have their communication skills honed as well (Horan, 2019).

Maintaining socializing efforts after the project's completion can be difficult. To combat this, it is necessary to strengthen local institutions, create alliances with government and NGO entities, and involve community members in the planning and execution of programs. Making activities sustainable may also entail coming up with ways to fund them in the long run.

Collaboration between community members, teachers, legislators, and local leaders is essential for successful implementation of these measures. Constantly evaluating the success of programs and making any necessary changes is essential for adaptability and responsiveness to the community's needs and circumstances.

CONCLUSION

To sum up, educating the public about the negative effects of early marriage in rural areas is essential if we want to keep girls in school and put off marriage. Collaboration between community members, educators, politicians, and local leaders is necessary for the successful implementation of socialization activities. Potential obstacles in the implementation of socialization activities can be overcome through the use of effective strategies such as involving local leaders, collaborating with schools and health centers, using culturally appropriate materials, training local educators and facilitators, monitoring and evaluation, and sustainability planning.

But it’s crucial to recognize that promoting early marriage education in rural communities is a complex and multifaceted issue that calls for steadfast effort and dedication from all parties involved. Poverty, gender inequality, and inadequate access to health care, education, and economic opportunities are all contributors to the widespread practice of marrying young. Improvements for girls, their families, and their communities can be achieved by concerted, long-term efforts to increase girls’ access to education and postpone marriage.

REFERENCES

